NOTICE.

With this part of the Journal the first series of 27 volumes comes to an end. It has been decided that in future its size shall be not demy octavo, but imperial octavo.

In coming to this decision, the Council of the Anthropological Institute have not been unmindful of the disadvantages attending any alteration in size, but have felt that in this case the advantages far outweigh them. In the first place the new volumes will have a much more attractive general appearance; secondly, it will be possible to illustrate them much more effectively. Where the illustrations to the journals of Scientific Societies are mainly of a diagrammatic kind there can be little, if any, advantage in an enlarged page. But the usefulness of an Anthropological Journal must always depend largely on the abundance and variety of the pictures it contains, whether of persons or things. Sometimes it is important to show objects with as little reduction in size as may be practicable; in other cases it is highly desirable to exhibit a considerable number of things on a single page, in order that their various characteristics may be visible at a glance. Something may obviously be done to attain these results with a page of the present size by means of folding plates. But the special liability of folding plates to be injured, even with the most careful usage, must always make their adoption an unfortunate necessity. And an enlarged page must very greatly reduce the need for their adoption.

In short, in improving the form of the Journal, the Council feel that they may claim to have considered alike the best interests of the Fellows of the Institute and the reputation of the Journal with students of Anthropology generally both in this country and abroad.

Owing to various circumstances, it has also been decided that the first number of the New Series shall not be published in August, but shall appear in November, as a combined August and November part.

May, 1898.
